

Calling all university undergraduates and graduates seeking to pursue a legal career in social welfare

What?

In 1988 Skadden established The Skadden Fellowship Program in the US which has been extremely successful over the last 30 years. The Fellowship Program, described by commentators as a "legal Peace Corps" and a "public interest law firm without walls," provides two-year Fellowships to talented lawyers to pursue the practice of social welfare and poverty law. Currently, there are approximately 800 former Skadden Fellows, 90% of whom remain in public service, with almost all of them continuing to work on the same issues they addressed during their Fellowship projects.

In 2020, Skadden's London office expanded the concept by setting up the Justice First Skadden Trainee Programme, known as the JUST Programme. The JUST Programme is administered by The Legal Education Foundation's (TLEF) Justice First Fellowship scheme, which funds training contracts and pupillages within a not-for-profit organisation that promotes social welfare law. Trainees subsequently qualify as solicitors or barristers in the sector.

Under the JUST Programme, Skadden will sponsor one trainee selected each year through TLEF's Justice First Fellowship scheme by providing funding to TLEF for the duration of the trainee's two year training contract. Skadden will also provide ancillary support directly to the selected trainee through offering the opportunity to visit the Skadden London office, make connections with Skadden partners and attorneys at social and educational events, training alongside Skadden attorneys on relevant topics, and getting involved in Skadden's pro bono training programmes.

Why?

The JUST Programme not only provides an entry point for the brightest undergraduates who wish to pursue a legal career focused on social justice to train in a sector that desperately needs new advisors, but it also directly assists indigent communities that JUST Programme Trainees will serve in the course of their training.
